An Emu is the second largest bird in the world and belongs to the ratite family of flightless birds like the ostriches in their native Australia. The Emu eats well in the spring, summer, and fall and stores surplus fat in a fat pad for sustenance during the winter. The female lays her eggs in the winter and eats very little. The male Emus sit on the eggs continuously for 50 days without eating, drinking, or defecating. Thus, the Emus need the stored fat for their survival. The fat pad is located on the back of the large flightless bird.

The use of Emus oil is believed to have begun by the Aborigines who collected the fat to heal all types of wounds. Early European settlers also began using the Emus oil for muscle spasms and treating skin ailments and disorders.

In clinical trials it has become obvious that Emu oil has two major actions, the first one being its anti-inflammatory properties and the second being its ability to penetrate the skin. Emu oil is non-clogging, contains high levels of fatty acids (Omega 3 & Omega 6) but has no hormones or steroids. Even in its pure state, it has withstood bacterial growth and has an indefinite shelf life.
